Ex-Senator John J. Ingalls has written for the Saturday Evening Post, of Philadelphia, two papers upon the later career of President Garfield. The articles are written by a man who knew Garfield in his youth, and afterwards saw at close range his public acts. Mr. Garfield in his youth, and afterwards saw at close range his public acts. Mr. Ingalls' brilliant prose, enlivened by anecdote and strengthened by first-hand knowledge, is well worthy of his subject.

The first of these papers will appear in the Post of August 20.

Vitality of Ma-caulay, the short story "In a Mutton-ham Boat," and John Barrough's paper on criticism, "Thou Shalt not preach." Mary Johnson's serial "To Have and to John's abbey. Collegeville, today and Hold," is maintained at a high pitch of juterest. It is a drama vitalized by a touch of realism founded on scholarship and a deep intoxication by the writer in her field and theme of romance. The story is planted in the Virginia colony at the time when a shipload of maidens
